IRELAND AND STARVATION.

One way to get a good idea of the condition of things in Ireland is to read the statements in regard to that country made by the English papers and then believe the opposite. But the best way of all to form a correct estimate of Irish affairs is to go to that unfortunate island and see what is before one's eyes.

Few, however, are able to do this themselves. Hundreds of thousands are enabled to do it through the intelligent and Impartial observer whom THE WORLD has sent there to inquire into the true condition of things. From this thoroughly reliable source enough is learned of Ireland's misery to make America's warmly sympathetic heart beat quicker. The potato crop, the prop of existence there, is saddy blighted, and dark days of poverty, hunger and sickness threaten that afflicted land. America will not fail to extend the help

THE CENSUS.

The returns of the blue-coated numberers are now sufficiently in to form some estimate of how many people there are in New York City. At present it looks as if the difference in the two counts would be about 150,000, the policemen seeming to have discovered that many more than Mr. Portra's enumerators.
